Explanation

According to tradition, Kunitoshi was the son of Rai Kuniyuki (来国行). The question of if Niji Kunitoshi and Rai Kunitoshi were the same smith has yet not been settled. As far as extant dated works are concerned, the active period of "both" smiths ranges from Kōan one (弘安, 1278) to Genkō one (元亨, 1321), which corresponds to roughly forty years and that does by no means rule out that we are facing here the career of a single smith. However, we see differences in the style of Niji Kunitoshi and Rai Kunitoshi works. The former show a magnificent sugata combined with a flamboyant chōji-midare hamon and the latter a more normal to slender sugata that is mostly combined with an elegant suguha-chō hamon. That is, we also distinguish between Niji Kunitoshi and Rai Kunitoshi on a mere stylistic level. Incidentally, there is only one signed tantō by Niji Kunitoshi and relatively many such by Rai Kunitoshi extant.

This blade is ō-suriage mumei and shows an elegant sugata with a slender mihaba and a ko-kissaki that is combined with a suguha-chō that is mixed with ko-chōji, ko-gunome, and prominent Kyō-saka-ashi. The kitae is a dense ko-itame and the bōshi features a rather later starting ko-maru-kaeri whereupon we clearly recognise the characteristic workmanship of Rai Kunitoshi. A masterwork among all blades that are attributed to this smith.
