Explanation

According to tradition, the Yamashiro smith Ryōkai was a student of Rai Kunitoshi (来国俊). Extant dated blades go back to the eras Shōō (正応, 1288-1293), Kagen (嘉元, 1303-1306), and Enkyō (延慶, 1308-1311) what suggests that that he was rather a colleague (fellow student) than a student of Kunitoshi. His workmanship is very close to Rai Kunitoshi but his jigane shows more tendency towards masame and a shirake-utsuri and his hamon is a more calm suguha whose nioiguchi is rather subdued in places.

This tachi is ubu but mumei. It was attributed by Hon'ami Kōson (本阿弥光遜, 1879-1955) to Ryōkai via a kinpun-mei. The blade shows a beautiful ubu tachi-sugata that reminds us at first glance of Rai Kunitoshi but the jigane does display nagare and the yakiba is partially subdued whereupon we can rather see the characteristic features of Ryōkai than those of Rai Kunitoshi and so we are in agreement with the period attribution. The blade is in its entirety very elegant.
